CONTEXT

The 2016 Euro-Mediterranean context and increasing challenges lead more than ever to address cultural, security and development issues in an integrated manner. First affected by economic crisis, climate change, as well as conflicts, violence and discriminations, women are also enablers and actors for positive changes. They foster sustainable development and inclusive economic growth, they nurture education and health and they promote mutual understanding and peaceful coexistence.

OBJECTIVES

1. Think about women as actors of change and solutions to the regional challenges.
2. Examine how to strengthen their positive contribution to development and stability.
3. Highlight women's role in enhancing sustainable development and inclusive growth, in promoting tolerance and mutual understanding and address the issue of women and migrations.
4. Get inspired from testimonies and concrete experiences.
5. Formulate recommendations in terms of policy decisions, exchange of experiences and good practices from the field and identify regional projects and initiatives.
6. Explore how strengthening regional cooperation contributes to improving women's situation and living conditions.

CONTENT

4 different plenary sessions dealing with current and critical issues in the Mediterranean region:

- ◇ Women as drivers for sustainable development and inclusive growth
- ◇ Women as key actors against extremism and radicalization
- ◇ Women, mobility and migration
- ◇ Preparation of the Ministerial Conference On Strengthening The Role Of Women In Society: A Gap To Close

Tuesday 11th October

09:00-11:00 Thematic Session 1 - Women as a driver for sustainable development and inclusive growth.

As small business owners or CEOs, employees, business school professors or association heads, members of boards of directors, shareholders, advocates for investment climate reform or consumers, women play an increasingly important role in the economy and help drive business success and development impact. Women also demonstrate a huge potential to improve resource productivity, enhance ecosystem conservation and sustainable use of natural resources, and create more sustainable, low-carbon food, energy, water and health systems.

Progress is being made in increasing women's participation in the economy and recognising their key role in achieving sustainable development. But there is still a considerable gap in women's participation. Women remain a largely untapped resource in addressing the pressing challenges faced by the Euro-Mediterranean region, and it is more than time to harness their great potential.

The session will address the following questions:

What is the contribution of women to the region's inclusive growth and sustainable development? How to make it more visible? How to harness women's full potential and overcome barriers that still hinder equal participation? How could regional dialogue and cooperation help to achieve these goals?

Moderators:

- Ms. Karina Chabour, Journalist, France 24.

Panellists:

- Ms. Jihen Boutiba Mrad, Secretary General, Business Med.
- Dr. Marianne Azer, Parliamentarian, Egyptian Parliament.

11:00-11:30 Coffee Break

11:30-13:30 Parallel Thematic Session 2 - Women as key actors against extremism and radicalisation

Throughout history, women have been both the vehicles and the drivers of positive change as peace-builders and mediators, and they have a key role in counter extremism and radicalisation.

Women are often the first to observe the early warning signs of extremism in families and at the community level. They can be voices of tolerance and provide a strong counter narrative message to extremism. Educated and empowered women, as teachers, mentors, journalists, faith leaders, civil society actors and political and community leaders, can act as role models to build resilience to the influence and spread of extremism. At the regional level, women's networks and women leaders can play a critical role by voicing their position to counter extremism and radicalisation and to influence strategies and programmes locally, nationally and regionally.

The session will address the following questions:

Is there a specific contribution by women to prevent extremism and radicalisation? How can we develop their full potential as peace builders and mediators, promoting mutual understanding and inter-cultural dialogue? What is the role of women leaders and women's regional networks in fighting against extremism? What are the capacity-building needs to support their efforts and to develop their knowledge and skills to reject the influence of extremism and to prevent radicalisation?

Moderator:

- Ms. Zeina El Tibi, Journalist, Observatoire d'études geo-politiques and President of the Association des Femmes arabes de la presse et de la communication.

11:30-13:30 Parallel Thematic Session 3 YouMatch: Job orientation and access to jobs for young women

Unemployment rates among women in the MENA region are considerably higher than those among men and the ILO World Employment and Social Outlook (WESO) 2015 even states an overall negative trend for women over the last decade. Across the region, the employment-to-population ratio for women is far below that of men and despite their participation in higher education, many young women drop out of the transition process from school to work and do not find their way into decent jobs.

An integrated approach is needed to empower (young) women and to enhance their access to decent jobs: at the beginning there is a particular need for awareness raising and job orientation for girls (and their families) while they are still at school. After graduation, school-to-work-transition schemes including job preparation must address the particular challenges young women are facing. Specific job matching tools for young women need to be developed. Moreover, the promotion of female entrepreneurship and self-employment can play an important role.

The session will address the following questions:

How can the school-to-work-transition of young women be improved? Are there good practices of employment services geared to the specific needs of young women? Are there successful strategies for young women to gain access to the labour market? What role can online media / social media play in this process? Do cultural values have an influence on labour market access of young women? What impact can regional exchange, for instance in the frame of the YouMatch network, have on the improvement of labour market access for young women?

Moderator:

- Ms. Nadine El Asmar, Founding partner, Beyond reform & development IRADA.

Panellists:

- Ms. Emanuela Pozzan, Senior Specialist on Gender Equality Director, Arab States Office, International Labour Organisation (ILO). (TBC)
- Mr. Sherif El Tokali, Assistant Resident Representative, Egypt Country Office, United National Development Programme (UNDP).
- Mr. Wedjen Ben Ayed, Deputy Director in the Cabinet of the Minister, Ministry of Vocational Training and Employment, Tunisia.
- Ms. Mais Gousous, Vice-President, "Akhtabout Cares Initiative" Champion.

- Ms. Eman Qaraeen, Technical Advisor TWEED – Promotion of Training to Improve Efficiency in the Water and Energy Sector II, giz Deutsche Gesellschaft für Internationale Zusammenarbeit (GIZ).

14:30-16:00 Thematic Session 4 - Women, mobility and migration

Women have always played an important role in international migration. International organisations estimate that women are half of the global migrant population, peaking as high as 70 to 80 percent of migrant populations in certain countries.

Along the migration route and on arrival in the country of destination, women and girl migrants face specific challenges as they are particularly vulnerable to situations of trafficking in human beings, exploitation, violence and discrimination. This is primarily due to their status as women, reflecting gender inequalities existing in both origin and destination societies, as well as their condition as foreigners. It is important to recognise the particular vulnerabilities of women migrants to afford them full respect for their human rights.

Once established in the host countries, women migrants can be an important factor for positive integration within their family unit and communities. Women have a growing role in the economic development of both the host country and their countries of origin.

The positive contributions of women and migration can be enhanced and the risks decreased in many ways. A consistent, comprehensive long-term strategy that maximises the benefits of women's migration and mobility is necessary. Partnerships, cooperation and synergies should be strengthened and multilateral and regional dialogues should be promoted with the involvement of all stakeholders including women migrants themselves.

The session will address the following questions:

What is the scope of women's migration and mobility in the Mediterranean region? How can we better take into account the specific needs of women refugees? What practical solutions and pathways are there to overcome identified threats and ensure full respect for women's rights? How does the gender perspective on migration relate to policy responses on education, health and the environment? How can we maximise the benefits of women's migration and mobility? What role can regional partnerships and regional cooperation play?

Moderators:

- Mr. Javier Parrondo, Head of Department of Cooperation with the Arab world and Asia, Agencia Española de Cooperación Internacional para el Desarrollo (AECID).

Panellists:

- Ms. Laura Thompson, Deputy Director General, International Organization for Migration (IOM) (TBC).
